Virus is a very small organism, smaller than a bacterium, which causes disease in humans, animals and plants. It is a parasite with a noncellular structure composed mainly of nucleic acid within a protein coat. Viruses are not plants, animals or bacteria, but they are the quintessential parasites of the living kingdoms. Although they may seem like living organisms because of their enormous reproductive abilities, viruses are not living organism in the strict sense of the word. It is known that viruses cannot carry out their life sustaining functions or reproduce without a host cell. Besides, some viruses do not kill host cells but rather survive within them in one form or another. For example, some of the viruses that can transform cells into a cancerous state are retroviruses; their genetic material is RNA but they carry an enzyme that can copy the RNA’s information into DNA molecules, which then can integrate into the genetic apparatus of the host cell and reside there, generating corresponding products via host cell machinery. They can have high rates of mutations that keep them undetectable. Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), the virus associated with AIDS, is a retrovirus that appears to have mutated into a number of strains that attack the immune system. Although viruses have been speculated as being a form of protolife, their inability to survive without living organisms makes it highly unlikely that they preceded cellular life during the Earth’s early evolution.
